When ("if" can no longer be fairly used) the Daily Fantasy Sports industry becomes regulated, Ethan Haskell, a content manager for DraftKings who earned $350,000 in one FanDuel contest after posting information that appeared to give him a competitive advantage, will be a central figure of the regulatory origin story. Following his "insider trading" incident in September 2015, many state and federal regulators began considering whether daily fantasy sports constitute gambling and whether it can be regulated.
